

Priority #1 : Humanize care and services

Everyone who works in the health and social services system is dedicated to providing quality service. Working on the ground, day after day, we know what it would take to make our system better meet the public's needs.

Expand and promote professional autonomy

We need to have a say in how services are delivered. We are in the best position to improve things. All they need do is listen to us!

It takes ratios!

This has been long discussed but successive governments have refused to introduce ratios in order to make our jobs more doable. Ratios are a key solution for improving the state of affairs in the health and social services system.

Promote knowledge transfer and professional support

Thousands of people join and leave the public system each year. We need to better support the next generation of workers while recognizing the efforts of the experienced workers who provide that support.

Let health care workers provide health care

Health care workers are spending too much time on administrative duties. They should be relieved of these tasks. Administrative tasks should be assigned to administrative staff, and more administrative support staff is needed.
